

Inspired by WritingFix's Weird Animal Adventures lesson, these third graders created organized stories inspired by Tuesday. The students created adjective-inspired descriptions. Your students can publish class writing done to this lesson here.

---

From Alaska to Egypt

by Alyssa, third grade writer

Friday, 9:00 in Alaska. Kelly, the snow leopard, was getting a drink of water. Slurp! Slurp! The ice began to lift her up. "Ahhh!" Kelly screamed in her loudest voice.

The ice floated all the way to Egypt where Kelly saw people mummifying a dead king. Kelly left that pyramid and went to a princess's pyramid. She saw a bright golden box there, and it said 'Do Not Touch.' Just then, the coffin lid slid open! Screeech!

Suddenly--Crash!-- the ice she was riding broke and Kelly fell. The mummy walked out of its coffin. "Ahhhhhhhhhhhhhhhh!" Kelly screamed, which hurt the mummy's ears so it covered them up.

The mummy chased Kelly, but then she remembered that mummies hate screaming! Kelly stopped and screamed in her loudest voice. "Ahhhhhhhhhhhhhhhh!" The mummy exploded, and Kelly knew she was safe at last.

The leopard thought to herself, "Where should I go next Friday?"

---

Legoland Ants

by Kyle, third grade writer

One Tuesday at 9:30 a.m., many red ants came to Legoland. It was crowded with people who liked to squish ants, but they didn't kill the red ants.

The ants wanted to do human being stuff. They wanted to buy Lego toys, ride scary rides, and have fun. When the people went away because it was nighttime, it was all dark and quiet. Now the ants could buy big Lego stuff, ride the scary roller coasters, eat candy, play and win games (like Hungry Hippos), and just have fun.

At 7:40 a.m. on Wednesday, the people come back, and they caught the ants doing human being stuff.

---

Friday

by Duncan, third grade writer

One hot, dry Friday night (at 6:30 p.m.), the snakes started flying out of their holes and into the air. They flew faster than cheetahs run. Some crashed into a saguaro cactus.

A bobcat appeared in front of them and chased the snakes until he rest caught up with their leader snake. Then the snakes turned around and chased the bobcat across a road with tumbleweeds, and they got stuck in the huge, spiky weeds. A strong gust of wind blew the tumbleweeds over and out the snakes flew. They slithered back to their homes in an S-shaped pattern.

Next Friday (at 6:31 p.m.), the bobcats started flying.

